

Our privacy policy is simple so you know what is happening.

I have never read a privacy policy because it is usually a bunch of lawyer stuff so I never really know, but I am not a fan of lawyering.

This is fun. I believe in simplicity; if we don't gain your trust we are screwed. When you receive your game there will be an authentication card inside. Come back here and register to become a part of our community. If you choose, you can click a check box to have all your info erased from our database, when I corner a programmer to write the routine. We will only keep your username, password and email addy so you can keep in touch.

The first thing on your mind is probably what is being done with my credit card information?

This answer I hope will give you confidence in us. When you press the Paypal widget you are transferred over to Paypal programming. You give your credit card information to Paypal, where we have no idea what goes on, which suits us fine because then we can't loose it for you. You can however be assured that Paypal is not going to loose it. The KGB couldn't hack into Paypal. Once they are finished taking your money, they give you back to our programming with a "good-to-go" or not.

Then what happens to the other information we are given by you?

We keep online only as much as is needed for you to login as a future member, and the rest of it is moved to our storage media which is offline from the internet. That information will not be disclosed. It is used only to communicate with you while your purchase is being finalized. When you come back to the community, you decide if you want to erase it or not. Hopefully you will become a member of the Big Board Raider community we hope to build. That's our policy.
